Research and Original Creative Work

I claim a practice that is fiercely gendered but that has roots in garden variety working-class values. My glossy car finishes, wood panels snapped by force, and textiles tufted thick, like animal hides, proclaim a femininity based on the hardened hands of working class women like my Eastern European grandmothers. Yet, in rueful acceptance of my whitewashed middle-class upbringing, I speak the visual language of consumerism. My projects include panels pigmented with furniture lacquer that come flat-packed to one's home for DIY assembly (instructions not included); contemplative color panels I commissioned from an auto body painter; rag rugs that display wage gap infographics, and paintings that function as neti pots for the eyes. Several years ago I began making textile paintings and sculptures. These tufted pieces are representations of tattered garments, suggesting the lingering presence of a hard-working body. To supplement my studio practice, I founded Comma in 2016, which is an annual publication of objects and words. In 2018 I invited my colleague, Carolyn Henne to co-Direct the project with me. We have published 3 volumes, have collaborated with over fifteen artists, scholars, and writers from FSU and other institutions nationwide. Comma has been exhibited nationally and is in many private collections as well as The Frick Fine Arts Library at University of Pittsburgh.

Program of Research and/or Focus of Original Creative Work

My research emerges conceptually from the anatomy of a painting: stretcher, canvas, pigment. Working within this framework has allowed my process to be open-ended, provisional, indeterminate, and often eccentric, breaching the conventional infrastructure of "Art" both formally and institutionally. Evidence of the physical engagement is reflected in the work, which centers on the body in its states of strength and weakness.
